History of Founders Day

On February 17, 1897, the two founders, Alice McLellan Birney and Phoebe Apperson Hearst, looked out at the 2,000 people from across the country who gathered for the Mothers Congress' first meeting in Washington, DC, and saw the beginning of the largest (and now oldest) volunteer organization that works exclusively on behalf of children and youth.

In 1926, Selena Sloan Butler formed the Mothers Congress' counterpart. She was the founder and first president of the National Congress of Colored Parents and Teachers (NCCPT).

After working 50 years apart, NCCPT and the National Congress of Parents and Teachers united in 1970 to expand their outreach. All three women—Selena Sloan Butler, Alice McLellan Birney and Phoebe Apperson Hearst—believed in making everyone aware of children's needs and possibilities. February 17 became known as Founders Day since it celebrated the founding of PTA.

In January of 1930 during a national radio broadcast from Washington DC, Mary Grinnell Mears described the significance of Founders Day in the life of the PTA: "This annual celebration should give local parent-teacher associations a closer touch with the national organization. It should impart information regarding the beginning of the organization and the high ideals of the founders and their associates. The purposes, needs, and achievements of the National (Congress) should be clearly presented with its recognized value to child welfare. Emphasis should be laid on its importance in the educational, religious, philanthropic, and social life of the country."
